Helping secure London's legacy

Queen Elizabeth Olympic Park (QEOP), wanted to refresh its messaging. It wanted a single creative concept that could work across multiple interests (events and B2B, right down to local community). Unlike other parks, QEOP is unique because it has been made by London, for everyone, so we gave it The park that London made. An ownable and flexible platform that has the scope to tell stories at any level across any of QEOP's varied audiences. While this creative sadly didn't win the pitch for our agency, it made the final shortlist of three.

Making pensions news unmissable

The rules governing auto-enrolment are changing. The Pensions Regulator wanted a campaign that could talk to both Pensions Advisors and Employers, highlighting the upcoming changes. So we pitched A change you can't ignore a playful and direct campaign. Visually we leaned into the trend for faux OOH and dropped an oversized exclamation mark into unsuspecting work environments. This creative won the agency the pitch and is currently being rolled across the Pensions Regulator's different channels.

Automatic enrolment is changing in 2025

Making Psychiatry UK the first step

Psychiatry UK were on the eve of launching a new dementia diagnosis service and wanted a cross channel campaign that would raise awareness and drive referrals. We harnessed behavioural insights to create a campaign that was striking, while also being sympathetic and understanding. We used familiar scenarios and real questions to position Psychiatry UK as the first step on the path to finding answers and plotting the best course of action. This creative helped win the pitch for the agency.

Saving HR from the Grumbles

Talentsoft can revolutionise the way you do HR. But potential customers thought they were getting by just fine without it. So we decided to grab their attention by bringing everyday inefficiencies to life as the Grumbles; cheeky gremlins that thrive in outdated HR systems. The Grumbles beat target engagement rates and gave Talentsoft an exciting and quirky new way of talking online and at events. The campaign was also recognised with the 2022 Worldwide Partners B2B Impact Award.

Making the complex simple with Fujitsu

Fujitsu wanted to refresh the look of its ServiceNow partnership, and asked us for a visual concept that would work globally. Together, Fujitsu expertise and ServiceNow software make the complex simple. So we reduced complex business processes into simple 3d shapes, created environments from these shapes, let our business professionals interact and play, and captured the results.

Helping Fujitsu talk about tech

Fujitsu make some pretty clever and powerful devices, but nobody was talking about them. Well, not many people anyway... The thing is, to the other tech out there Fujitsu devices were creating quite a stir. So we created a series of vox-pops to find out what the buzz was all about.

Our clients loved this campaign, it smashed performance expectations, landed the agency the 2020 Worldwide Partners B2B Impact Award, and was shortlisted for the Drum's Best Digital Campaign B2B. And almost as importantly, we had loads of fun making it.

Giving chocolate giving a refresh

Thorntons came to us with a challenge—millennials and Gen Z aren't giving chocolates as gifts any more, they just aren't seen as cool. So we took a truth and turned it on its head. Thorntons aren't the old fashioned or boring option, they're timelessly thoughtful. There's a reason chocolates are the first idea that comes to mind when you need to find a gift. Sure they might be obvious, maybe even a little clichéd, but people love them, so why overcomplicate things.

63 THE STATE OF THE INDUSTRY

YOU TAKE AND SPEND, THEN DISAPPEAR
 Their operating costs, they distribute the remaining money as royalties to the big publishing houses and the record companies, such as Universal, that have publishing arms.
 Back to "Bake It Off". That song was heavily rotated on radio and in pubs, it's been covered in YouTube fan videos and parodies and played over the PA at Wedding Machine. It's earned by more than 200 digital service providers around the globe and has been streamed six years 200 million times. Yee's streams there appear as a single revenue line in the collective quarterly earnings report. There are more 700,000 digital revenue sources today. Yee's total earnings last one single line.
 When Kubalt collects royalties for an artist, it tracks thousands of data points. For a single artist hit that yielded $4 million in sales that year, Kubalt's conditional agreements prevent or stunt the song. It went up to 60 pieces of metadata - crucial identifiers to make sure the right people get paid. These include industry codes for the song's five writers, five publishers, their last residences and session musicians. It efficiently transferred revenue of the song and split it into 60 revenue streams. Revenue flowed in from 300 territories worldwide.
 Kubalt estimated it 170 million times to 2.2 million licenses before it was paid. Kubalt collected many payments at each of those uses directly from these publishers, putting it in its portal for the artist to see. With the traditional model, the collection agencies and record publishers either share royalties and then pay it to the labels or artists' publishers. When they do, the artist's share, the digital house may not appear as a single revenue line. It's not that the labels or publishers are acting dishonestly. It's that they don't possess the metadata to track and track the usage data. Many can't do the math. "What we've done is we've had a company putting money in the bank for you and then the bank won't tell you how much money there is, or the name of the people who deposited it," Kubalt says. "There's only one way to check it: you have to audit every penny of it."

TRANSPARENCY is something that the music industry has tried to do before. In 2012, the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) released a 200-page document called "The Music Business Factbook". It was a 200-page document that listed the names of the labels and their artists, and their artists' earnings.

“ Ask Simon WHO'S BEEN A GOOD BOY THEN? ”

OTHERS ILLUSTRATE KUBALT'S POWER BETTER THAN AN example set up by Jay Martin. He is the manager of Eminem's former producer Jim Beatz Productions, the company behind the 2002 Eminem hit "Real Slim Shady". Beatz was a 50% partner in the song's writers included Eminem, Jeff Bass and Luis Resto.
 Many of the artists among these writers signed up with the publisher, Jim Beatz. Beatz was represented by Universal and Beatz by Jay. With three accounts collecting on the same song in every territory, Martin sat back and watched. "We saw that our share was going to be huge," he says. "When we went to Universal to get our share, we expected to see the same share show up on the same line. That didn't happen."
 What did happen was that the big publishers took their share and to report money they collected and pay the artist, in every territory.

Serving up the remedy with Proofpoint

Rather than the one-size-fits-all approach of most cybersecurity providers, Proofpoint tailors cover to fit your people. We brought this individual approach to life as the Remedy Bar, a pop-up speakeasy Proofpoint could take on the road. The bar centred around mixologists who served up custom cocktails, each inspired by one of Proofpoint's solutions. And tucked away within the bar was a VIP area where customers could talk more openly about their cybersecurity concerns.

Bringing customers up to speed on slow cooking

The Agriculture and Horticulture Development Board came to us with a problem, people weren't buying stewing meat. And to make matters worse, focus groups showed that people who were buying it weren't enjoying it because they didn't know how it was supposed to be cooked. So we came up with a campaign that turned stewing meat's main downside, its cooking time, into its USP.

Helping Teams achieve with Microsoft

It might be hard to believe now, but in 2019 Microsoft had a problem—everyone had Teams, but nobody was using it. So Microsoft asked us for our ideas and we pitched a Microsoft idea right back. Let's gamify Teams with a plug-in that gives users achievements just for using it.

The clients loved this idea, and spent the presentation coming up with their own ideas for badges. However, before we had the chance to get to stage two, a novel corona virus from Wuhan in China got everyone using Teams much more quickly than we ever could have.
